The Often Misunderstood Coyote

or

“Getting Along With Our Wildest Neighbors”

Recent research says:

- Coyotes play a beneficial role in our ecosystem.
 - In our area, coyotes are the largest natural canine predator.
- Coyotes prey on small and sometimes destructive mammals like rabbits, mice, chipmunks, and squirrels, which reproduce rapidly. Without predators like coyotes, they may quickly overpopulate our neighborhoods. Coyotes even eat some insects!
- Coyotes hunt other small animals that are known for harboring parasites and diseases such as Lyme.
 - Lyme disease is carried by rodents which infect ticks that feed off of deer. By moderating the deer and rodent populations, coyotes significantly decrease the opportunity for ticks to feed and reproduce. They actually play a significant role in protecting our health and that of our pets.
- What’s going on when we hear that hair-raising chorus of howling, barking, and yipping at night? Is it coyotes displaying their enthusiasm after a kill?
 - Experts say “NO”. Coyotes are quiet after a kill.
 - To us, the sound is ominous and eerie. However, when we think about it, we realize that it would be a poor survival tactic for a coyote to announce their kill to competing predators.
 - Coyotes howl primarily to locate and communicate with their pack and establish territory. It’s actually a social behavior.
- Coyote safety and your beloved pet.
 - Like most predators, coyotes are by necessity, opportunists.
 - If possible, avoid walking your dog at twilight or at night.
 - Use a short leash for better control - not a retractable one.
 - Avoid leaving a tethered or loose pet in your yard, especially at twilight or after dark when coyotes are most likely to be hunting.
 - Don’t let pet dogs or cats run free, lest they become a target of opportunity and be the coyotes next tasty snack.
 - Keep your garbage secured.
 - Notable: Birdfeeders draw insects, raccoons, rabbits, possums, squirrels, rats, mice, and all manner of ground feeding rodents, which in turn, draw coyotes.
